On the Impact of (Research on) Financial Stress

Prof. Dr. Wilco van Dijk

Social, Economic and Organizational Psychology
Knowledge Centre Psychology and Economic Behavior
Leiden University

Across the Netherlands, the cost of living increased sharply during 2022. Energy (+114%), petrol (+18%) and food (+11%) all contributed to a high inflation. Consequently, many Dutch households experience financial stress as they struggle to make ends meet.

Financial stress is a psychological state evoked by a perceived threat (i.e., shortage of money) combined with the appraised inability to adequately deal with the threat (i.e., lack of control over one's financial situation). Financial stress causes depression and anxiety, impedes cognitive function, and instigates avoidance behaviour. It impacts relationships with others negatively, resulting in experienced stigma and social exclusion. And it affects work performance, indicated by absenteeism and reduced productivity and commitment.

I present our research on the causes and consequences of financial stress, and address possible ways to reduce it or counteract its negative consequences. Moreover, I talk about how we use our work on financial stress to create societal impact. In the Knowledge Centre Psychology and Economic Behaviour, we apply our insights to design behavioural interventions, share our knowledge with practitioners and policy makers, and support programs that aim to reduce financial stress and promote financial well-being.

Goal Orientation: A Tale of Shifting Horizons

Prof. Dr. Alexandra Freund

Developmental Psychology
University of Zurich

Most of the literature on motivation and personal goals neglects the role of age in processes of setting and pursuing personal goals. In this talk, I take the position that such age-decontextualized models of motivation might neglect important aspects of motivation. Arguably one of the most striking changes across the lifespan is the decrease of gains and the increased losses. Whereas younger ages are best characterized as a time of acquiring new skills and resources and only relatively few losses, middle and particularly older adulthood are affected by increasing losses. The losses are most prevalent in physical and cognitive functioning, social roles, as well as the remaining life-time. In this talk, I will argue that the changes in gains and losses affect motivational processes which, in turn, influence developmental outcomes. More specifically, I will present studies centering around goal orientation as a central dimension characterizing personal goals, i.e., the framing of goals as being oriented towards the achievement of gains, the maintenance of the current state, or towards the avoidance of losses. I will present several empirical studies demonstrating the shift in goal orientation across adulthood, and its consequences for goal pursuit and well-being.
